Private Enterprise

There are 60,000 postoffices in the United States operated by the Government.

There are 70,000 cities and towns reached by telephone.

The Government rents or owns the postoffice buildings, owns the mail pouches, and pays the wages of the postal clerks.

The biggest item in the mail service—the transportation of the mails—is in the hands of private enterprise.

The Government doesn't own a single postal car, an engine, or a mile of track.

It depends entirely upon private enterprise—the railroads—for the essential thing that makes its mail service possible.

The Bell System has 10,000 more offices than there are postoffices.

Every mile of wire, every pole, and every switchboard that helps to furnish the Universal Service of the Bell System was paid for and is owned by private enterprise.

In the mountain region alone, the territory served by your telephone company, there are 3,151 telephone offices, handling over a million calls every day.
